Development of breastfeeding support model from health professional and effects on breastfeeding practice among mothers employed outside the home

Paper abstract

Breastfeeding is an effective way to promote the health of infants. In many countries, the rates of breastfeeding remain lower than recommended. It is important to find effective breastfeeding support. This participatory action research aims to develop the breastfeeding support model and to test the effects of this model on exclusive breastfeeding rate at six months. Participants were 35 and 34 employed mothers after childbirth in Mahabulakong Chiang Mai hospital and Lumphung hospital before and after implementing breastfeeding support model, respectively. Quantitative data analysis included frequency, percentage and Chi-square whereas qualitative data analysis by using content analysis. Research findings were the breastfeeding support from health professional model for mothers employed outside the home that focused the continued breastfeeding when they return to work after childbirth by starting from the postpartum period until return to work at least six months of infant age. This model consists of 6 steps including 1) support for breastfeeding initiation at recovery after childbirth in the hospital, 2) support for breastfeeding in the first month at home, 3) assisting for action plan to exclusive breastfeeding, 4) follow up for continued exclusive breastfeeding, 5) reviewing their action plan to practice when they return to work after childbirth, and 6) evaluation and additional help when they return to work. The study found that the exclusive breastfeeding rate at the first six months of mothers who received breastfeeding supporting was higher than those of the mothers who received routine care statistically significant at the 0.001 level.
